Many Universities are jumping on the on-line course and program bandwagon, but is this a good thing or a bad thing? Research shows that some students are good on-line students and some are not. It could be said that some professors are good on-line professors and some are not. Yet, many universities are not giving students or professors a choice. So, how do you decide what should be on-line and what shouldn’t? How do you create and/or teach on-line courses when you are not given a choice? In this session, attendees will get three perspectives on on-line courses (and programs) and how to go about creating and how to succeed in that environment. Several of the pitfalls as well as some of the highs will be discussed. Some examples will be shown. If time permits, participants will also discuss their experiences and suggestions.
